➤ Occupational therapy:

Occupational therapy (OT) is a specialized healthcare profession focused on helping individuals overcome physical, cognitive, emotional, or developmental challenges that hinder their ability to participate in daily activities. These activities, or "occupations," encompass everything from self-care routines to work, leisure, and social interactions. Occupational therapists, or OTs, collaborate with individuals, families, and communities to identify goals, develop personalized intervention plans, and enable clients to regain or develop the skills needed to lead a fulfilling life.

Occupational therapy in early intervention is a service that helps infants to childhood (from birth to age 6) who have developmental delays or disabilities. Occupational therapists (OTs) work with children and their families to help them reach their full potential in all areas of development, including:

- Physical development: This includes skills such as sitting, crawling, walking, and using their hands to manipulate objects or to develop the fine motor issues.
- Cognitive development: This includes skills such as problem-solving, learning, and paying attention.
- Communication development: This includes skills such as understanding and using language.
- Social-emotional development: This includes skills such as interacting with others, making friends, and managing emotions.
- Play: Play is an important part of development for all children, but it is especially important for children with disabilities. OTs can help children with disabilities develop play skills so that they can participate in age-appropriate activities with their peers.

OTs in early intervention use a variety of techniques to help children reach their goals. These techniques may include:

- Direct therapy: This is one-on-one therapy with the child. The OT will work on specific skills that the child needs to improve.
- Parent training: OTs can teach parents how to help their child with specific skills at home.
- Family support: OTs can provide support to families of children with disabilities. This may include helping families find resources, connect with other families, and cope with the challenges of raising a child with a disability.

Early intervention occupational therapy can make a big difference in the lives of infants and toddlers with developmental delays or disabilities. By providing early intervention, OTs can help children reach their full potential and participate in all aspects of life.

Here are some specific examples of how occupational therapy can be used in early intervention:

- An OT can help a child who is struggling to sit up develop the strength and coordination needed to do so.
- An OT can help a child who is having difficulty feeding themselves learn how to use utensils and drink from a cup.
- An OT can help a child who is not talking develop the skills needed to communicate, such as using gestures and facial expressions.
- An OT can help a child who is withdrawn and socially isolated learn how to interact with others and make friends.
- An OT can help a child who has difficulty playing develop play skills so that they can enjoy age-appropriate activities.

If you are concerned that your child may have a developmental delay or disability, it is important to talk to your doctor. They can refer you to an early intervention program that can provide your child with the services they need.

➤ Special Education/ Special School:

Special education, also called special needs education, the education of children who differ socially, mentally, or physically from the average to such an extent that they require modifications of usual school practices. Special education serves children with emotional, behavioral, or cognitive impairments or with intellectual, hearing, vision, speech, or learning disabilities; gifted children with advanced academic abilities; and children with orthopedic or neurological impairments. See also deafness; blindness; speech disorder; mental disorder; gifted child; childhood disease and disorder; learning disabilities.

The goals of special education are similar to the educational goals for ordinary children; only the techniques for attaining them are different. An effort is made, for example, to teach all children with special needs (except those unable to profit at all from school experience) to read. Children who have learning and mental disabilities require prolonged periods of intensive and more-individualized instruction; for them the learning process might include techniques to maintain interest, more active participation, and much more repetition of similar material in varied form. Children with severe sensory handicaps (such as deafness and blindness) must learn to read through other sense modalities. Deaf individuals learn to read through visual methods, while blind individuals learn to read Braille through the tactile sense.
